At its most basic level, work in presales involves everything towards a sale up to – but not including – the closing deal. A presales consultant works with potential clients or customers to ensure they have a strong understanding of the services and/or products provided. So, presales consultants are typically employed by companies that are selling something for which a level of technical knowledge is required to get to grips with its uses and benefits. Accordingly, this role is sometimes referred to as a ‘technical presales consultant’.

Responsibilities:delivering presentations and demonstrations to prospective and current clients liaising with those developing products/services to gain an in-depth knowledge that you can relate to customers – and to let them in on user behavior and/or any potential changes clients would like helping the sales team to reach targets conducting research into the industry – including competitor research encouraging clients to buy extras, upgrades etc potentially considering new markets or clients to contact, based on your knowledge of both the products/services and their users.Requirements:leadership and communication skills presentation skills interest in and understanding of the industry – often a technology-related one the ability to research and keep on top of industry developments influencing and negotiation skills aptitude for time management and organisation problem-solving ability.#J-18808-Ljbffr
